Sproul penned in his commentary;

This doctrine of predestination causes not just confusion and bewilderment but fury, even among professing Christians. This always baffles me. There is no greater demonstration of grace than this doctrine, because I cannot point to any reason why am I in the kingdom of God and someone else is not. It certainly is not because of something I have done.

At this point, you might be thinking: “This whole text is about works, about feeding the hungry, giving drink to the thirsty, taking in strangers, clothing the naked, and visiting the sick and the prisoners. Doesn’t that show that works are involved in salvation?” It might seem so, but we are told over and over again in Scripture that justification is by faith alone. Thus, works play no part in salvation. However, justification is not by a faith that is alone; it is not by a mere profession of faith. Anyone who possesses saving faith immediately begins to do good works. We are not justified by our works in any way whatsoever, but we are justified to good works. Thus, the ultimate test by which we will be determined to be in Christ or not is the presence or absence of fruit. On the last day, our professions of faith will be judged by the works we have performed. Again, we are not justified by our works, but if we do not have works, that is clear evidence that we do not have saving faith.
