Sproul on The Lord not willing that ANY should perish.

"If we are going to understand this text in its context, we have to consider the antecedent of the word "any." There is no mystery to that; it is abundantly clear in the text itself. God is "longsuffering toward us, not willing that any should perish"—the antecedent of "any" is "us." The only question left to answer is the identity of the "us." That, again, is not difficult. Peter is clearly distinguishing the believer from the unbeliever, the scoffer, and the false prophet. In order to correctly grasp the context of "us" in 1 and 2 Peter, we need only look to whom these epistles are addressed—Peter is writing to the elect. Therefore, the "any" and the "us" are the elect. No passage in all Scripture more strongly defends unconditional election than this one. God sovereignly decrees that none of His elect will perish and that all whom He has chosen will come to Him. They will repent. They will come in faith to Him, because election is not in the abstract. Election is unto faith, repentance, and salvation."
